After a very tiring Poetry Night at Khar (West), I was heading home. Actually, it was not even night, but I did not understand why it was called as Open Mic Poetry Night.

Khar, perhaps the sky here is the same I saw that day, every October evening- the time of the year in Mumbai when the monsoon bade goodbye, after annoying all the middle-class Indians in Mumbai with its extra downpour and also annoyed all the backward classed farmers in Maharashtra with its menial downpour. It was the first time I had come to Khar and it was a hard time for me to search for the venue- The Hive. No autrickshawwallah seemed to know where The Hive was, and it left me ignored by the sorority of the beautiful place I was in.

I thought it for its 8. There were many other Hindi, Marathi, Malayalam, Telugu and Urdu newspapers.

"Don't they sell newspapers in Sanskrit?" I wondered.

While paying the stoic guy who had a whimsical moustache I asked him whether he knew the place. Newspaper suppliers definitely know all the nooks and corners of a place they supply newspapers to. So my common sense had worked right and I then walked on to the venue of my evening whose atrocious name had turned it into a repository of parlous interpretations.

But the catch in the story goes when I was returning home. I had smoked 5 cigarettes then and the day was over as of yet. I had exceeded my daily count. Yet I smoke anxiously outside Khar Station out of madness and sense of some achievement. I boarded the CST Harbour Line and had a peachy
